

Carava and the Recent Movements on the Rio Grande.

(From the Washington Republic, March 20.)

The sales of cotton, &c., were affected at very fall prices—middle $\frac{1}{2}$ a lb., & less. These sales had declined to \$10 a \$15 25.

CINCINNATI, March 21, 1862.—Port has advanced, and 100 bbls. were sold yesterday, at $15 50 a $16. Flours very dull, and no sales.

The Miami Canal was re-opened on the 18th inst., and some of their undertaking that it has been difficult to arrive at anything like satisfactory or consistent conclusions. To assist in placing the matter in a clear light, and in enabling our readers to form more definite ideas, we have inserted a detailed statement in relation to it, we deem it most important to give a condensed narrative of the facts, as we have received them from a reliable source of information.

Some time ago Juan J. N. J. Caraval, formerly a slave, and now the son of a Mexican aristocrat, visited Brownsville, in Texas. He was the author of a pamphlet, claiming title to large grants of land in Texas, between the Rio Grande and the Nueces rivers. In particular he was the agent for Jesus Cardenas, the Governor of the State of Tamaulipas, who, with other members of his family, took title to what they claimed were grants containing 100 leagues or about 400,000 acres, and embracing the Salt Lake. His object was under pretext of exchanging these lands for merchandise, to introduce a large quantity of merchandise into the interior of the country, &c., &c. His wife, Laura, was a priestess, as we have no information that there was any such exchange in good faith contemplated. The plan was to go to get permission from the Mexican government to have a fair extent for spinners, &c., &c. We quote fair Mobile, 10 M' middling fair, 9 M' fine, &c., &c. The market is dull, considering which sales have been made to a fair extent. The sales have been 74,300 lbs. at 26 a 450. There is a fair demand for printing cloths, and prices have advanced one sixteen, with an improving tendency. Sales for the week, 47,350 pieces.

On Sunday morning, March 21, at 11 o'clock, the company, which joined at Brooklyn, called the Brownsville company, commanded by Capt. Edward B. Hove, which joined Caraval a few days before he started for Matamoras, the military commandant at Matamoras was unable to identify Canadas, Canales, Macedonio Capistrano, the commander of the national guard at Matamoras, and other persons of influence, were doubtless pledged to the movement.

It is said that Caraval was to commence the outbreak in the city of the Rio Grande, where he had no influence; and after his first success, the State authorities were to unite with him, and Canales was to have chief command.

About this time Capt. Ferdinand of Texas gave a detailed report of the movements of the rebels, and that they were friends of long-standing of Gen. Arista, the President of Mexico, who it is believed must have been aware of the order given for the introduction of the goods, and who failed to prevent it, it could have been committed without involving him.

It is proper to remark, though that Cardenas, Canales, and Caraval have been regarded as disaffected persons towards the general government, and were all together with Gen. Arista engaged in an attempt to revolutionize the country. The rebels, however, the revolution commenced to be agitated. There were many causes of dissatisfaction on the frontier—real grievances under which the people labored. At Avila, the military commandant at Matamoras was unable to identify Canadas, Canales, Macedonio Capistrano, the commander of the national guard at Matamoras, and other persons of influence, were doubtless pledged to the movement.
